

DECOLONISING THE MUSEUM: ARKOTONG LONGKUMER

Arkotong Longkumer

“When I was growing up in Kohima, Nagaland, in Northeast India, I heard stories about Rani (queen) Gaidinliu, a woman who lived nearby. People said that she was powerful, a prophet, and a leader.” So speaks Arkotong Longkumer, Professor of Anthropology and Modern Asia, of childhood memories of Gaidinliu (1915-1993), a Naga resistance leader arrested by the British as a teenager in the 1930s. From 2022-26, Prof. Longkumer is leading a major research grant from the Arts and Humanities Research Council to explore a collection of Gaidinliu’s possessions (and some belonging to her close associate, Haipou Jadonang) held in the Pitt Rivers Museum at the University of Oxford. He is supported by a postdoctoral fellow Dr. Gaurav Rajkhowa and co-investigator Prof. Clare Harris (Oxford).

Community members handling notebook replicas

Photo: Tarun Bhartiya

“She was accused of threatening the British Raj because she tried to reform and revitalise the traditions and religion of her people. The British were suspicious of her, so she was pursued and arrested. Twenty seven personal items are in the Collection in Oxford. There are 12 notebooks, 1 stick with a monkey skull and ginger, 3 short wooden clubs, 1 basket, 2 spiral bracelets, 1 spiked bracelet, 7 shawls. We’re digitising that collection and showing it to people in the community that she came from and beyond. We started with the physical originals in Oxford and made 3D photogrammetry and photographs for community-curated exhibitions and interactions in the Naga homelands (Nagaland, Assam and Manipur), especially among the Zeliangrong Nagas. Her immediate family and various communities hadn’t seen those objects for 80 years. How do they connect with people in the Naga homelands today in memories and practices?

Printed replicas from 3D models

Photo: Gaurav Rajkhwa

“In order to consolidate all that we have learnt from the communities over the last 4 years, we’re running a 1-year exhibition at the Pitt Rivers Museum starting in October 2026 and creating a digital museum to enable indigenous communities to access the collection. The exhibition focuses on what the collection tells us about Gaidinliu’s life, what people remember of her, and what kind of practices associated with the objects are still alive. I want the Naga people to learn more about this period of history. I hope that people in the UK will learn about this indigenous resistance, led by a 16-year-old girl, and appreciate the diversity of voices within colonial struggles. Working on such a powerful story, and with a complex group of stakeholders, has been humbling. Everyone brings something to the table. It’s a group endeavour, not an individual project.”

An impression of Gaidinliu’s feet at Hangrum village, Assam
Photo: Gaurav Rajkhowa

Annual Pilgrimage to Bhuban Cave,
Assam
Photo: Gaurav Rajkhowa

Gaidinliu's home and a memorial bust at Lungkao village, Manipur

Photo: Gaurav Rajkhowa

60 SECOND INTERVIEW WITH SNEHA ROY

Dr Sneha Roy is a British Academy Postdoctoral Fellow. A socio-cultural anthropologist, she is a graduate of Delhi University, Durham, and Wales Trinity St. David. She is working on Hindu nationalism, gender, and ecology in the borderlands between India and Bangladesh.

Where did you grow up?

In a small town in Jamshedpur in India. It was cosmopolitan and really fun.

What kind of undergraduate were you?

At school I was focused on sports and dance. University was a different ball game. I could choose the subject I wanted to study: anthropology. That was a turning point in my life.

What's the biggest misconception about your field?

That it's easy because you're dealing with people. Understanding people is sometimes more complex than Rocket Science.

Why did you move to the University of Edinburgh?

It's one of the most inclusive schools where I could work around topics of religious nationalism, ecology, gender with an area focus on south Asia.

What do you read outside of your academic work?

Jane Austen (always) and Charles Dickens (current spree).

How would you like to be remembered?

As someone who can be trusted with intimate emotions and experiences particularly of those who have had experienced violence of sorts.

SEBASTIAN MOLL READER OF CULTURE

Sebastian Moll's path has never been conventional. Following studies in Bonn and Lausanne, he first came to Edinburgh for an MTh (2005) on the second century heretic Marcion. "I actually handed in my Master's thesis in the form of a play, Meet Marcion. I was drawn to him because he was a controversial and prominent figure in his day, and there was no up-to-date scholarship on him.” Funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council, he then wrote a PhD (2009) on the same figure. An academic career soon opened up, first at the University of Mainz, and then in the Evangelische Akademie in Bingen am Rhein. Today, though, Moll works as culture editor for Die Tagespost—a weekly Catholic newspaper. How did his path wind from ancient Christianity to cultural journalism?

“In my years as an academic, I’d also been writing freelance on cultural affairs for the paper. It just so happened that the culture editor retired, and I was asked if I was interested in the job. I had no formal training in journalism, although I’d been writing for many years in both the academy and at a popular level. Even when I was in the academy, I liked writing in a way that people could understand, and that could reach a wide readership.

“I love my job. I write an article each week, and work with other writers. We review cultural events and discuss cultural questions. I get to meet and interview interesting people, and write about things that fascinate me. At the moment, I’m writing a series of articles on sermons in novels, starting with Moby Dick, and covering a lot of other literature. To do that kind of journalism, you need to know your theology. The same is true across modern culture in general. Religion influences culture deeply. For a newspaper like mine, it helps to have journalists who have a high level of religious literacy.

“Edinburgh is my happy place. Whether I was in Rainy Hall, playing in the New College basketball team, or doing detective work in the library, I always felt like part of a community. I loved going down into the library stacks and hunting for clues, evidence, and texts. I miss that. I could talk to faculty about scholarship, but also normal life. They were the best years of my life.”

AMY PLENDER SERVING GRENFELL

Alumna Amy Plender (MA Hons 2015, MTh 2017) is a civil servant who works on the UK Government's response to the Grenfell Tower fire.

"I chose Edinburgh before I chose a subject. I wanted to be in a big, exciting city that had a life beyond the university. My first plan was to study English Literature. I did a gap year in Haiti after the earthquake in 2010, which made me think about my faith in a new way. I hadn't done Religious Studies since GCSE, but I applied for theology in Edinburgh and got in. I arrived wondering if I might still transfer into English, but people at New College were so lovely and I loved its sense of community. By the end of first year I saw that everything I loved about English Lit was also there in Divinity: telling stories, exploring nuances of language and understanding, connecting with people through old and modern texts. I took an outside course in Scottish Literature in first year, but from then on, all my courses were in Divinity.

"I stayed on for the MTh because I felt I had more to learn. Religious literacy is important to me—especially in helping people who don't have a faith understand what it's like for people who do. My postgraduate research was on suffering, trauma, and lament. After that, I applied for an internship in London with the think tank Theos. It was a communications and research post, so my theological background meant I got opportunities to write on social issues, and to speak on Radio 4's Sunday programme. That six-month internship then became a job.

"The Grenfell Tower fire had happened while I was a student. Through my background in lament and inter-faith dialogue, I'd been interested in how faith groups had responded, and was asked by Theos to write about it. My religious literacy and trauma-informed background helped me approach those issues.

"I moved on from Theos to work for Eido Research, providing management consultancy for churches and faith groups, but eventually I applied for a civil service position working with Grenfell.

"My background in theology informs my civil service work profoundly. In a typical week I engage with government ministers and bereaved parents. My work always has many facets and means thinking through difficult problems. Theology trains you for that kind of real life complexity. It pushes you towards nuance, humanness and meaning."

New School Promotional Films

This year the School is working hard to boost recruitment so, we commissioned two new promotional videos, an undergraduate and postgraduate one. The aim of our undergraduate film was to present the subject and the school in a new light and to also focus on some of the things that really appeal to undergraduates such as; community, diversity of programme's and our building.

For the postgraduate film we wanted to appeal to a diverse group of students, such as those with families, highlighting the different paths you can take with your studies. We also wanted to emphasise how great our academic staff are and the support they offer.

Click on the images to watch the results below.

Undergraduate film

Postgraduate film

You can also see the individual interviews from the postgraduate film here

Postgraduate Playlist

New Courses on Old Languages Syriac and Sanskrit

This year, New College launched new courses on two ancient languages with great significance to religious traditions across the world: Syriac and Sanskrit.

Dr Salam Rassi, Lecturer in Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations: “Syriac opens up some of the most ancient translations of the Bible, the earliest Christian poetry, and the history of Christian-Muslim interactions. Only a handful of institutions in the world offer training in it. It’s exciting to see Edinburgh emerge as a new location where students can study one of the most important languages in the ancient world.”

Sanskrit is taught by Dr Upali Sraman, the School of Divinity’s first Lecturer in Buddhist Languages. “The School of Divinity’s commitment to offering Sanskrit and other ancient languages fosters a diverse and inclusive learning environment, preserving important linguistic traditions. Teaching Sanskrit is a joy because it opens the door to a fascinating tapestry of South Asian literary, cultural, religious, philosophical, and scientific achievements. The enthusiasm and diligence of my students inspire me to step into the classroom eagerly each day.”

Esther Mombo becomes Honorary Doctorate

Esther Mombo holding her Doctorate

In 1994, the Kenyan theologian Esther Mombo arrived in Edinburgh to begin a PhD at the Centre for the Study of Christianity in the Non-Western World (now the Centre for the Study of World Christianity). Three decades later, she returned to her alma mater to give the 2023 Cunningham Lecture and to receive an honorary doctorate in recognition of her many contributions to theology – and in particular, to the place of women in African theology.

“I was brought up as a Quaker, south of Lake Victoria. My grandmother was my first theological educator. She taught me about equality, stewardship and peace. When I applied to study in Edinburgh, I was teaching at a Bible school in a patriarchal space. I wanted to enlarge my vision, to support women who do ministry and to write about African theology. Through the support of friends, I got a Commonwealth grant that was given through the Church Mission Society, and came to Edinburgh.

“I started with a theological focus but shifted to history, working on African women in the Quaker tradition. I sat in seminars at New College and also in the Centre for African studies: development, theology, and history. Edinburgh was a free space. I got to know students from Korea, Germany, Scotland, Ireland, lay and ordained, men and women, young and old. It was a joy to be able to study within that kind of community.

“The Centre was small and cozy. You knew everybody who was associated with it. I got to know people personally, and their projects, and even their families and church traditions. I felt I could grow academically and socially. I've kept in touch with friends from those years. I've taught in South Korea, and have good friends in Nigeria and France. Scottish friends took me to ceilidh dances.

"In my time, everyone worked in the computer lab. We journeyed and laughed with each other there. It was a space to vent, which is good for a PhD student!

"Edinburgh shaped my international outlook. There was room to think, to envision, to question, to critique, to analyse. Religion has the power to convene and convince. I don't avoid discussing how religion can be positive and negative—we can see that in the ways women have been treated in the Christian tradition. That's why I've worked very hard in opening more space for women to enter into theological space and to grow there."

Esther Mombo is Professor of Church History and Theologies from Women's Perspectives at St Paul's University in Limuru, Kenya.

Esther Mombo with Peter Mathieson and Professor Emma Wild-Wood

Mary of Guise

Visitors to New College will be well familiar with the statue of John Knox that looms large in the quad—a memorial that vividly depicts his dramatic place in Scottish history. The building renovation work of recent years has given us occasion to consider the place of others in that history, and in particular, prominent women whose stories also form the backdrop to our school. Under the leadership of Prof. Susan Hardman Moore, that reflection led to the celebrated Scottish sculptor Tim Chalk being commissioned to create a bronze plaque of Knox's contemporary, Mary of Guise (1515-1560), for the quad. The mother of Mary, Queen of Scots, her palace on the Mound fell into ruin, before eventually being demolished in 1845, when New College was built.

Chalk, who had previously contributed work to John Knox House, reflects on his new subject: "She was quite a complex person, an astute political operator, with a clear vision of the art of ruling and a strong sense of personal survival. I'm pleased by the juxtaposition of her with Knox because, generally, women's place in history hasn't been recognised. This adds a balance to that."

The Mary of Guise plaque was installed in the entrance to the New College quad in May 2023. We are delighted to see our building adorned by a piece of remarkable sculpture that reminds us of our site's fascinating local history, and that also challenges us to reimagine our community in the present. The New College community is indebted to Tim Chalk for his contribution to our school.

Changing the Prison Service

Our students go on to many different careers. We spoke to Sophie (MA Hons, Theology) about her path from New College to the prison service.

“My faith was a big factor in studying theology. As a Christian I wanted to study my faith in a context where I’d be challenged by people who thought differently from me.

“I’d never visited Edinburgh before, but as soon as I came here I was sold. When I visited New College it was so friendly. There was a community feel that I hadn’t experienced when visiting other universities.

“I loved the choice to decide what you want your degree to look like. Alongside theology I took outside courses in Mandarin and Criminal Justice. Working in small groups with students from different backgrounds helped me interact with people, and stretched my thinking. The staff were so personable as well.

“In my workplace I need to find points of connection. Relating to people from different backgrounds and creating space for their ideas, and being able to pull out the gold in other people, are all things I developed at New College. I did a year abroad in Sydney, Australia, which was great.

“I’m on a two-year graduate programme called Unlocked Graduates for people who are interested in changing the prison system for the better. I work full-time as a prison officer in a men’s prison in London, and I’m also studying for a Masters in Applied Custodial Leadership.

“At New College, I was inspired by a friend who worked with offenders as they left prison. I wrote my dissertation on John’s Gospel and rehabilitation in English prisons. After university I took a year out to work in another job, and one of my friends started in a graduate scheme working a women's prison. I then applied, and loved the assessment process.

"The job is hard. You see people at their lowest moments. But the small wins are really worth it. You see violence, but also acts of kindness. Showing care to vulnerable people is my faith in practice. A lot of men explore faith for the first time in prison. I can engage with them on that level as well. Next year I'll be on placement with the Ministry of Justice. Long term, my goal is to make changes so that people have a different life when they leave prison.

"Theology opened so many doors for me. I don't regret it for a second!"

New College News

Latest updates from around the School.

Principal Jack

Prof. Alison Jack has been inducted as Principal of New College, succeeding Prof. David Fergusson. Her installation was presided over by the Moderator of the Presbytery of Sterling, with our own Prof. Susan Hardman Moore serving as preacher.

AHRC Success

Dr Arkotong Longkumer has received a major grant from the Arts and Humanities Research Council for a multiple-year project on 'Decolonising the Museum.' This award, in excess of £1 million, will explore items taken from Nagaland and now housed in the Pitts Rivers Museum, in Oxford.

Tutor of the Year

Final year PhD student Stephen Dolan won the Student Teacher of the Year at the 2022 EUSA Teaching Awards. This is the second year in a row in which a New College PhD student has won this award.

Science and Theology

Prof. Mark Harris has been elected president of the European Society for the Study of Science and Theology—one of the longest-running and most distinguished international scholarly societies for the study of the relationship of the natural sciences and theology.

British Academy Fellowship

Dr Anja Klein has been awarded a £100k Mid-Career Fellowship by the British Academy. This award will enable her to work on 'Theology born from Crisis:

Resilience Discourse in the three Major Prophets.'

Black History

This year's New College Black History Month Lecture was given by Imam Mustafa Briggs, on 'Beyond Bilal: Black History in Islam,' and was jointly sponsored by the School of Divinity, the University of Edinburgh Islamic Society, Race.Ed, and the Edinburgh Race Equality Network.

For more news and events from the School of Divinity visit our main site

Divinity News and Events

New College Festival

Following their critically acclaimed Winter Tales book festival in 2021, Professors Alison Jack and Jolyon Mitchell welcomed a range of outstanding speakers and writers to the Mound in November 2022 for Books and Belief — a two-day event on the creative range of ways in which writers explore a diverse range of beliefs.

Dr Eric Lewis Williams

New College alumnus Dr Eric Lewis Williams graduated with a PhD in Religious Studies in 2015. Following a first academic appointment at Harvard University, where he was Lecturer in African and African American Studies, his career took a surprising turn when he became Curator of Religion at the Smithsonian.