

The important attitude: the research for desire

Confronting decolonisation for the ECF class assignment, I've started to consider adopting the research for desire described in an open letter, "Suspending Damage: A Letter to Communities"(Tuck, 2009), in my final project.

After reading it, I became aware that the seemingly righteous attitude, 'We will first research the problematic status to improve society.' can damage and make the subject a fixed entity as a problem. In the last semester, I asked my friends to help me implement my research about their political attitudes. Was my investigation polite enough to my subjects? I worried that I somehow reinforced them as typical Japanese citizens who were apathetic toward politics.

My final project must deal with the negative aspects of Japanese society. Furthermore, I may ask people to raise their voices through interviews or other means. I've decided to conduct my project considering the impact on the people involved while facing the severe aspects.
